Topic: The Shepard Tone of Information Security

Irrespective of whether you call it "Cyber" or "Information Security", we've all found ourselves in an industry that expands and evolves at an eye watering pace. This means the volume of information to learn can be both exciting and intimidating for those just entering the industry, but those of us who have been around a little longer should also think the exact same thing. New Zealand always punches above its weight in terms of innovation; this means opportunities for information security professionals are now opening up into industries previously not considered possible. As information security professionals, we now need to ask "which industry would you like to work in?" Telecommunications (5G), finance, autonomous vehicles, or maybe even the space industry. Infosec plays a major part in all of them.

This presentation looks at the past, present, and possible future of information security and what it will take for all of us to remain part of the most exciting industry

Presenter: Mike Seddon

Mike drifted into infosec without realising it was going to consume decades of his life. Mike has moved from the private sector into the shadows of government where he's been lurking for the past five years.

All this time he's continued to play a major role in the New Zealand Internet Task Force (NZITF) he cofounded in 2008 and as founding board member of New Zealand's Infosec awards (iSANZ).
